(*) Indian philosophy describes prana flows in channels called Nadis. Shiva Samhita says there are a total of 350,000 nadis in the human body, while other texts say there are 72,000 nadis, each branching to another 72,000. These nadis play an important role in the application and understanding of certain yoga practices. Shiva Samhita explains that the three main nadis are Ida, Pingala and Sushumna, each of which facilitates the flow of prācā vāyu throughout the body. Ida nadi relates to the right side of the brain, and the left side of the body, ends on the left nostril. Pingala nadi relates to the left side of the brain and right side of the body, ending at the right nostril. Sushumna nadi connects the base chakra at the base of the spine to the crown chakra at the top of the head. [quote required] The practice of pranayama can be used to balance the flow of prana in the body. When prāwāyu enters a period of uplifted, intensified activity, the yogic tradition refers to it as pranotthana, a precursor to kundalini state.
